native, give him a set of animals, or, if necessary, set before him the probability of punishment for wanton cruelty, a great step will have been taken towards in some measure reducing the shocking cruelty at present so rife, and so little thought of.

There is fine scope in a country like Egypt for the introduction of the system inaugurated in England many years ago by that eminent philanthropist, Lord Shaftesbury. It is not too much to say that by his efforts in the East End of London, his lordship completely altered the treatment of the London donkey by the costermonger. Instead of treating him as a mere beast of burden, out of which the last ounce should be taken in the way of work, Lord Shaftesbury taught the lesson of kindness and by offering prizes for the best-kept animals, induced a spirit of emulation among the costers that soon bore fruit in well-fed, well-groomed, and willing animals. The effect of this philanthropic work did not pass away with the man to which it owed its inception, and to this day the results of his life may be seen by any one acquainted with the London costermonger and his ways. If we were to suggest what we think affords the best opening for individual effort for ill-used animals, we should say that there is much to be done towards inducing better treatment of mules. One has only to watch for a short time the painful struggles of the poor animals in two-wheeled carts, laden with building material, dragging their loads, through deep sand, and straining their stumps to bring them to their destinations, to see how these must tell upon the life of the animals. "The merciful" man is merciful to his beast" and it is this lesson that wants enforcing, in and out of season, and at any and every opportunity.
