it would be doomed to failure, and its prohibition in public offices and conveyances is, for the present, the only practicable limitation of the vice—for a habit dangerous to the safety of the public health is a vice—which the State can aim. But public opinion can be educated, and a new generation may yet be trained to regard what passed unnoticed among its ancestors, and we urge the leaders of the present movement against the disease to show no discouragement if their ideas are slow in finding favor with the people. Education is really the best remedy for disease, and it is on the gradual spread of education among the masses, especially in the great cities, that our sanitary reformers must rely.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

"Man's inhumanity to man" is too frequently accompanied by cruelty to animals, and no claims on humanity are greater than those advanced by the societies established for the purpose of repressing that cruelty, and lessening its results on the suffering victims. Complaints on the parts of visitors during the winter season have been so frequent of late years that we would urge upon all who can do so, the necessity of exerting any influence, however slight, in the direction of securing better treatment, not only of horses, mules, and donkeys, or other animals which the societies more especially protect, but of dogs, cats and birds, the latter more especially, in view of the scenes enacted before the eyes of tourists during their trips on the Nile for the purpose of extorting money from the sympathetic. Two months will elapse before the tourist influx commences; it promises to be greater than ever this year, and in proportion to the increase of visitors, will be the number of animals required for their use, and the scope for the practice of cruelty. If in the meantime some efforts can be made, individual and collective, to instruct the native, give him a few lessons on kindness to animals, or, if necessary, set before him the probability of punishment for wanton cruelty, a great step will have been taken towards in some measure reducing the shocking cruelty at present so rife, and so little thought of.

There is fine scope in a country like Egypt for the introduction of the system inaugurated in England many years ago by that eminent philanthropist, Lord Shaftesbury. It is not too much to say that by his efforts in the East End of London, his lordship completely altered the treatment of the London donkey by the costermonger. Instead of treating him as a mere beast of burden, out of which the last ounce should be taken in the way of work, Lord Shaftesbury taught the lesson of kindness, and by offering prizes for the best-kept animals, induced a spirit of emulation among the costers that soon bore fruit in well-fed, well-groomed, and willing animals. The effect of this philanthropic work did not pass away with the man to whom it owed its inception, and to this day the results of his life work may be seen by any one acquainted with the London costermonger and his ways. If we were to suggest what we think affords the best opening for individual effort for ill-used animals, we should say that there is much to be done towards inducing better treatment of mules. One has only to watch for a short time the painful struggles of the poor animals in two-wheeled carts, laden with building material, dragging their loads, through deep sands, and straining their utmost to bring them to their destinations, to see how these must tell upon the life of the animals. "The merciful man is merciful to his beast" and it is this lesson that wants enforcing, in and out of season, and at any and every opportunity.
